The extinct family Mimarachnidae Shcherbakov, 2007 (Fulgoromorpha) was previously diagnosed by its simplified venation, setigerous metatibial pecten, and the spider-like dark silhouette and black eyespots of tegmina. The Mimarachnidae were known from the compression/impression fossils in sedimentary deposits of Buryatia (Russia), Japan and Spain (some not formally described taxa come from Mongolia and probably also from Brazil), and recently new fossils representing this family were found in mid-Cretaceous Burmese amber. With these new findings the presumed distributional pattern in the middle to high latitudes probably with the seasonal alteration was broadened to tropical palaeoequatorial zone, indicating that Mimarachnidae could live in the tropical forests.

The taxonomic and morphological disparity of these inclusions exceed far beyond the known richness, with several eco-morphological traits present among modern planthoppers to be observed, allowing descriptions of new taxa at various levels. Mimarchnidae seems to be an endemic family for the Cretaceous period, but their disparity is comparable to modern planthoppers, leading to the questions of tempo and mode of eco-evolutionary adaptations on one hand, and reasons for rapid origination and extinction of this group on the other. The recent discoveries of particular Mimarachnidae with peculiar adaptations, venation patterns and genital structures, hardly comparable with modern planthoppers, put a set of new questions and possibility of new explanations of the Fulgoromorpha phylogeny and relationships.
